

None. See the instructions for description. ##Section 3: Conclusion to a blog post Create an introduction to a conclusion of a blog post that is informative and factual. The conclusion of your opinion blog post should include at least two points that summarize your position on the topic, as well as offer actionable advice for what readers can do based on your opinion blog post's position or thesis statement. In many cases, these points may be summarized in one sentence each. Depending on length constraints, you may have more than two points in this section if appropriate to the content of the opinion piece being created. Use the following points to help develop your conclusion section. Use an active voice, as opposed to a passive voice, as this will keep your reader focused on what you are saying rather than what you are saying about what something means. Include specific benefits of your opinion or thesis statement from your research. Do not state generalizations without providing specific examples from the source you used. For example, "If a business owner does not have a website, then they will not be able to compete" is a generalization that makes no attempt to show why or how it is true. To provide a specific example of why this generalization is true, try the following: "According to the Small Business Administration, as many as 75 percent of businesses with websites will see an increase in revenue as a result of having one. Without such a website, however, those same businesses risk losing potential new clients." Use clear and direct language that is free from grammatical errors. Use active voice and provide examples about what you mean by any statements you make in your conclusion section. Some writers may employ the use of a common hashtag at the end of an online blog post. Try to avoid this method of sign-off; instead, simply use the word "end" or "finish" to conclude your blog post. Write an introduction to a conclusion of a blog post that is informative and factual. None. One of the most basic ways in which you can communicate the importance of sustainability and environmentalism is to become conscious about what you consume and use in your daily life and environment. This includes, but is not limited to: food, water, land, money; personal care products; clothing; transportation; cleaning supplies; electronic devices; and anything that either you or any other person owns or uses on a sustained basis. The simplest way to do this is by doing research online about different companies that produce environmentally friendly consumer products. When looking for companies that are environmentally friendly, it is good to use the following keywords in your search query to narrow your search results: The following are several companies that produce environmentally friendly consumer products. If any of these companies are interested in having you test their products, please contact them directly or do further research on their websites.
