Australia

The COVID-19 pandemic has wreaked havoc in Australia. Owing to issues of border closures, flight unavailability, and quarantine regulations, the universities and lives of university students have been severely influenced. International students contribute about $40 billion to the economy. International education furthermore supported about 250000, over a range of sectors. With the COVID-19 restrictions in place, about 70% of students in the higher education sector have been severely affected. The financial impact of the pandemic is also rather stark. Due to the loss of international students and issues of lesser enrolment in the international universities, academic and professional job loss of as high as 35000 has been observed.

Impact Of Covid-19 On University Education In Australia: Student's Perception

Most of the international students studying at Australian Universities have reverted to online studies. However, the impact of COVID-19 was rather negative for courses that required more practical work. For instance, for students belonging to the medical field, the experience was rather negative. As a result of it, a decline in the learner engagement ratings was observed. Students have stated that online lectures hampered their engagement with faculty. Furthermore, group discussion was also negatively influenced.

International students have also termed lack of support to be a major impeder in their performance. Due to the pandemic, the students were stuck in a foreign country. Further,

Australia provided financial support to domestic students. Further, since most of the universities were not well-versed with online education, it was especially daunting for students.
