

Dealing with Hoarding? When to Call a Company for Junk Removal Services

Hoarding is entirely different than a messy home. Compared to a more traditional cleanup, there are typically a lot of complications when dealing with a hoarding situation. Although they may not admit it, hoarders usually struggle with a tremendous amount of guilt. Also, their collecting habit likely started in response to a trauma. Therefore, it is imperative to hire a company for junk removal services that understands the mindset of a hoarder and the vast quantity of items involved.

If you have a hoarding problem or a loved one who does, the time to use a junk removal service is when the home becomes unhealthy or dangerous. Several things can trigger a call for help in a hoarding situation:

Therapy — A cleanup is often part of therapy for hoarding. Because of that, it is common to see a mental health professional at the house during cleanup to help the hoarder get through the process. By hiring a company for junk removal services in Toronto with understanding and experience dealing with hoarding scenarios, the team will show a lot of patience.

Court Ordered — The risk of injury or even death is by far the greatest concern in most hoarding situations. As a prime example, some hoarders collect newspapers, books, magazines, and other flammable material. With a massive amount of paper inside the house, one small spark could prove disastrous. With no quick or easy way to exit the home due to piles upon piles of junk, a hoarder could become trapped with no way for fire officials to help. For this and other reasons, a court will require the hoarder to create a safe environment by a specific deadline.

Illness or Injury — A hoarder with a disability or who becomes sick or injured would be another reason for calling a junk removal service. If the piles of junk prevent first responders from reaching the individual, the situation could quickly turn deadly. The goal in seeking professional help with junk removal is to ensure this never happens.

Selling or Losing the Property — Whether a hoarder passed away, moved, or is going through a foreclosure, there is no way for the new property owner to clear out everything. Even if family and friends step in to salvage as much as possible, not only is the quantity too much to deal with but there is an excellent chance most of the items are nothing more than junk. For a situation like this, the individual who buys the home or the bank that took it back would need professional assistance.
